EDITORIAL

Indonesia as part of Southeast Asia's recent economic dynamism has helped to stimulate renewed interest in the study of many aspects of this complex region. This collection of articles or essays explores the evolution of various disciplinary approaches mostly to Indonesian socio-cultural studies. Basing their approaches on sociology, geography, economics, languages, politics, anthropology, international relations and on a consideration of literature, the authors examine many of the crucial debates and controversies of the past, and aim to provide a picture of the current scholarship in each discipline as it relates to the specific region or local government.

In the early 2017, KARSA as journal of social and Islamic culture have witnessed the extensive resurgence of social, economics, cultural, and political issues and struggles in different parts of Indonesia. These include the rise of people's movements demanding access to land and other resources; growing attention to land reform by governments and official development agencies; heated debates over customary tenure, often framed in terms of ethnic nationalism and indigeneity; and the emergence of new forms of rural-urban connections, often in the context of the collapse of relatively secure forms of urban employment, the rising costs of urban services, and the decentralization of many state functions to local and district governments. These processes fly in the face of linear, theological and teleological notions of rural-urban transition. Most importantly, they provide a crucial window into vibrant, yet little recognized, forces for social change, some of which are in the process of forging connections with one another. Yet, in this era of neo-liberal capitalism, natural resources questions remain a central grievance closely linked to ongoing, if not intensifying, dynamics of poverty and inequality. In one way or another, most researcher believe that natural resources questions remain the very heart of Indonesian policy in the period of reformation and mental revolution.

Several articles ini this edition including part of working paper report grows out of a call for papers project at the State College for Islamic Studies under entitled with many themes of KARSA as journal of social and Islamic culture, alike : Islam, culture, and politic, social & law dimension, languages, environmental problems, education, economics, and madurology (madurologi) as well. In the middle of rainy and sunny season meeting was a resounding success, with our mutual intellectual and policy commitments coming together to produce fresh and exciting insights and ideas as we brought different dimensions of Islamic institution, agrarian change, social change, environmental problems, shifting cultural dimension, and religious dynamic studies in Indonesia, especially Madurese socio-cultural studies to the forefront. These extremely productive discussions extended over several weeks, and culminated in a successful workshop or focus group discussion in STAIN Pamekasan campus on May 4th, 2017. Therefore, KARSA acquired many debts of gratitude in the course of completing this edition June 2017. KARSA in Pamekasan Madura, were greeted with enthusiasm by many groups and individuals willing to share their points of view and experiences with us: scholars, activists, and practitioners from many universities and colleges, many institutions, public and private universities, both under Ministry of Religious Affairs or Ministry of Research, Technology & Higher Education Republic of Indonesia.
